Authorities suggest water conservation

By Carol-Lyn Jardine

High temperatures and low moisture levels have pushed water conservation into the limelight this summer.

Water conservation practices suggested by the Utah Division of Water Resources are being encouraged in cities statewide.

Top on the list of conservation tips is not watering during the heat of the day, said Bart Simons, water sources manager for Provo City. The peak hours to be avoided are between 10 a.m. and 6 p.m.

But some citizens are wondering what their municipalities are doing to conserve.

Simons said he knows residents wonder why they are encouraged not to water during peak hours when they see some of Provo City's grounds being watered during those times.

Provo Parks manager Doug Robins said not watering during the day is the standard for his department, but it cannot always be avoided.

Some of the city's areas are monitored and controlled by an automated computer system; however, until more funding is provided, the rest of Provo City's grounds are on a manual system, Robins said.

"The ones that aren't automated are hard to deal with," Simons said.

Robins said the manual systems sometimes have glitches that throw the timing of the watering off. When that happens, the areas have to be watered when someone can physically go to the site.

Robins said the new system being implemented will be good for conservation efforts.

The beauty of the computerized system is up-to-the minute adaptability, Robins said.

Areas on the new system have water level sensors. When the water levels rise, the system adapts watering times. For example, after a significant rainstorm the system will adjust to water for a shorter amount of time or not at all, until water levels indicate the need, said Robins.

A system similar to the Provo City plan is in place at BYU.

Grounds maintenance director Roy Peterman said the system at BYU is very extensive and constantly monitored for efficiency and conservation.

"The process is a lot more complicated than people think," Peterman said.

He said his department is always working to improve water conservancy on campus.

Most of the watering that happens in the heat of the day on campus is for evaluation purposes, Peterson said.

"We are doing water audits to ensure that we have the highest efficiency of water application that is possible," he said.

Peterson said everything from sprinkler heads and soil conditions to micro weather systems are monitored at over 2,000 stations on campus. This monitoring allows very specific adjustments to be made at each station, Peterman said.

He said conservation techniques beyond the basic tips are implemented at BYU.

Bush sidesteps voting reform

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Bush, who still faces stinging criticism over the way he won last year's election, gave a lukewarm embrace Tuesday to voting reforms recommended by former Presidents Carter and Ford, calling their proposals only guidelines.

Bush, casting himself as an election reformer, accorded Carter a Rose Garden ceremony to unveil the report by the National Commission on Federal Election, which he led with Ford. But Bush avoided taking a stand on specific proposals, including making election day a national holiday, restoring voting rights to felons and allowing voters challenged by poll workers to cast provisional ballots anyway.

"Today I accept their report and recommend the key principles drawn from the report as guidelines for meaningful reform," Bush said, with Carter standing beside him. Ford could not attend because of a scheduling conflict.

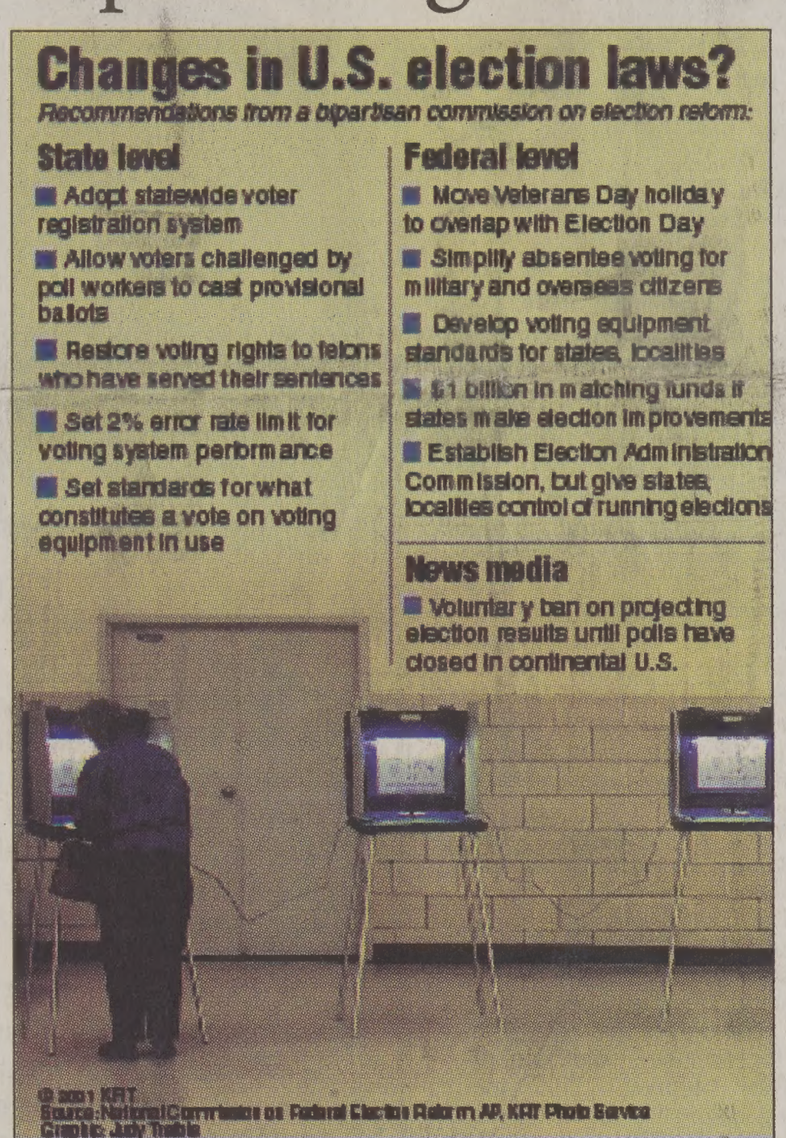
"I commend the commissioners for their statesmanlike work. They have risen above partisan emotions and put forth practical suggestions for improving democracy and the United States Congress should listen to them and follow their lead," Bush added.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., said the Carter-Ford panel "took a serious look at our election laws and found ways to improve them. I think this commission gives us a framework from which to work from."

Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle and House Democratic Leader Dick Gephardt issued a joint statement saying, "Now ... it is up to Congress to act in accordance with the broad goals of the commission." They noted that a Senate committee marks up its first election overhaul measure Thursday.

The 19-member commission calls for a voluntary embargo on airing Election Night projections by the news media until polls have closed everywhere in the continental United States. Failing that, Congress should consider legislation to ban disclosure of official results until 11 p.m. EST or to set a uniform national poll closing time.

White House spokesman Ari Fleischer called that a good recommendation but said the administration will review it before committing. He also said that as Texas governor, Bush had restored felons' voting rights, eliminating a two-year waiting period to let them cast ballots after they'd served their time.



Changes in U.S. election laws?
Recommendations from a bipartisan commission on election reform:
State level
Adopt statewide voter registration system
Allow voters challenged by poll workers to cast provisional ballots
Restore voting rights to felons who have served their sentences
Set 2% error rate limit for voting system performance
Set standards for what constitutes a vote on voting equipment in use
Federal level
Move Veterans Day holiday to overlap with Election Day
Simplify absentee voting for military and overseas citizens
Develop voting equipment standards for states, localities
$1 billion in matching funds if states make election improvements
Establish Election Administration Commission, but give states, localities control of running elections
News media

Injured Utahns sue Disneyland

Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — A Utah couple who said they were among nine people injured on a Disneyland roller coaster last year sued the amusement park Monday, saying Disneyland tried to conceal the accident's seriousness from investigators.

Jonathan and Julie Woodcock's lawsuit, filed in Los Angeles County Superior Court, accuses the amusement park of negligence and infliction of emotional distress. It seeks a jury trial and unspecified damages.

A spokesman for the Walt Disney Co. did not immediately return phone calls placed Monday evening. However, spokesman Ray Gomez told The Orange County Register that Disneyland employees acted appropriately.

"Any emergency involving illness or injury to guest or cast members, our first priority is to get medical help to the scene as quickly as possible," Gomez said.

Attorney Ryan Saba of Beverly Hills said the couple was at Disneyland on July 31, 2000, to celebrate Julie Woodcock's 40th birthday when they were injured on the "Space Mountain" roller coaster ride.

The accident happened when a wheel assembly broke on one of the cars, causing it to derail. Nine people suffered various neck and back injuries and passengers were suspended on a track 40 feet in the air for up to 45 minutes before being rescued, the lawsuit said.

> "Any emergency involving illness or injury to guest or cast members, our first priority is to get medical help to the scene as quickly as possible."
> — Ray Gomez, spokesman for the Walt Disney Co.

Jonathan Woodcock suffered 13 bulging disks, nerve damage from the base of his neck to the bottom of his spine, a dislocated jaw, cracked teeth, a ripped right rotator cuff and a joint disorder, according to the suit. His wife suffered a collapsed arch in her right foot; permanent damage to her right knee, hip and shoulder; and two herniated disks, the suit said.

The action states that Disneyland may have hindered the arrival of prompt medical attention and either failed to report the accident or did not adequately relay its seriousness to the state Division of Occupational Safety and Health, an agency that has regulatory powers over amusement park rides.

A captain with the Anaheim Fire Department criticized the park in his report on the accident, saying Disneyland employees tried to keep it "as stealthy as possible."

U.S. servicewomen protest wearing of native attire

In Muslim nations, women have been wearing traditional dresses called abaya for a long time now. It's a practice some feel is unfairly forced on women in the American Military, who are required to conform to these dress standards off base and in public.

"It greatly undercuts the military's professed commitment to gender equity," said Steven H. Aden, chief litigation counsel for the Rutherford Institute, an international, nonprofit civil liberties organization located in Charlottesville, Va. Aden is considering suing the Defense Department.

The abaya is a black head-to-toe garment with a head covering worn in certain Muslim cultures and, according to the Rutherford Institute, is perceived as a religious and cultural sign of subordination to men.

The abaya began to be worn 1,400 years ago during the religious wars as a way to protect the captured from being identified, said Abdullah Al-Howish, a Saudi who works for Arab-Heritage.com, based in Falls Church, Va.

This protection is no longer necessary, Aden said.

"There have been cases where female officers were confronted by religious police," said Lt. Colonel Dave Lapan, Pentagon spokesman.

The defense department maintains its desire to protect servicewomen from unnecessary conflict, Lapan said.

Muslim clerics have stopped the women on the streets about their dress style, he said.

The policy requiring wearing of the abaya, ordered by the Riyadh, Saudi Arabia commander for Joint-Operations Southwest of the U.S. Air Force, only applies to female military personnel serving in Saudi Arabia, Aden said.

Any skin below the neck that is not covered is considered pornographic by the Saudis, Aden said. Rutherford spokespeople said the standard uniform, "camis," with long sleeve shirt, pants, and hat, provide adequate covering for the female officers.

Due to the pressure being applied to the Secretary of Defense by the Rutherford Institute, the policy is under review by the Secretary and the Joint-Chiefs-of -Staff, Aden said.

The Defense Department confirmed that the policy is under review by Air Force Brigadier

Bush backs disputed committee head

WASHINGTON — President Bush "stands proudly and tall" behind his disputed nominee to head the Consumer Product Safety Commission, a spokesman said Tuesday, accusing Senate Democrats of making political flip-flops on the issue.

The Senate Commerce Committee is scheduled to vote Thursday on Mary Sheila Gall's confirmation as chairwoman of the agency that oversees consumer product safety, and Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle has said he will not bring her nomination to the Senate floor if the committee votes against her.

Democrats, who hold a one-vote majority on the committee, charge that Gall has, as a member of the commission, developed a record of favoring businesses over consumers. Fleischer countered Tuesday that many of those same Democrats approved her appointment as commission member twice before.

Russian commandos raid hijacked bus

MINERALNYE VODY, Russia — Russian commandos stormed a bus seized by hijackers Tuesday in southern Russia not far from separatist Chechnya, killing one of the two gunmen after a 12-hour standoff.

Explosions and gunfire rang out as an elite anti-terrorist squad and other soldiers raided the bus, which was stopped outside the airport in Mineralnye Vody.

Commandos set off two concussion grenades, prompting one hijacker to stick his head out a bus window. A sniper shot him dead, said Valery Kavtosenkov, a spokesman for the Federal Security Service in the regional capital, Stavropol.

The condition of the other hijacker was unknown. Earlier, there had been conflicting reports about whether he was still on the bus.

Burger King recalls 2.6 million toys

WASHINGTON — Burger King is recalling about 2.6 million "Hourglass Space Sprout" and "Look for Me Bumblebee" toddler toys because they can break open, releasing small beads that children can choke on.

The toys were distributed in Burger King Kids Meals for children younger than three, the Consumer Product Safety Commission said Tuesday.

Miami-based Burger King has received 18 reports of the toys breaking and six reports of children placing the beads in their mouths.

"There were no injuries involved, but when we heard about the potential for issues we wanted to withdraw them," said Burger King spokesman Rob Doughty. "Safety is a top priority."

Auditor sentenced to federal prison

WASHINGTON — A former Internal Revenue Service auditor with a long history of mental illness was sentenced Tuesday to three years in a federal prison hospital for a shooting incident outside of the White House.

U.S. District Judge Henry H. Kennedy accepted the terms of a plea agreement acknowledging Robert W. Pickett's assault on federal officers and possession of a gun without a license in violation of a local law. Kennedy recommended that Pickett be allowed to serve the sentence at a Bureau of Prisons hospital in Rochester, Minn.

"You are mentally ill," Kennedy said during a sentencing hearing that lasted less than 15 minutes. "Take advantage of the treatment that will be afforded you."

House debates stem cell researc

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Pushed to action by rapidly advancing science, the House began dealing Tuesday with the problem of how to prohibit human cloning without stifling scientists' ability to find cures for Alzheimer's, diabetes and other diseases.

"We are sailing into uncharted waters," Rep. Louise Slaughter, D-N.Y., said as the House began what was expected to be several hours of debate. "Our decision here today could have consequences for years to come."

"If we stifle our nation's research efforts, patients will suffer as well," Slaughter said.

But Rep. Sue Myrick, R-N.C., responded, "It's wrong to create human embryo clones, even for scientific research."

The debate forces lawmakers to deal with the much-talked-about issue of stem cell research. President Bush will decide soon whether to let federal money be used for medical research on stem cells from human embryos.

Tuesday's action places Congress squarely in the center of the stem cell debate. The two pieces of legislation on the House floor seek to prevent scientists from cloning people, but they differ greatly on how to handle research, which includes the use of stem cells. One prohibits all cloning, even for research. The other bans cloning only for reproductive purposes.

The Food and Drug Administration has said it has the authority to regulate cloning. But there is no law banning cloning.

The Bush administration issued a statement Monday saying it would support the ban on all human cloning. "The administration unequivocally is opposed to the cloning of human beings either for reproduction or for research," the statement said. "The moral and ethical issues posed by human cloning are profound and cannot be ignored in the quest for scientific discovery."

Republican Rep. Jim Greenwood, a sponsor of the less-restrictive alternative, said the ban "goes over the top."

"That is backward. That is unscientific," said the Pennsylvania lawmaker.

Stem cells are building blocks for all human tissue. The most versatile cells are derived from embryos discarded at fertility clinics, but some abortion opponents say it is wrong to use them for research.

The House debate centers on another way to obtain stem cells, a process known as therapeutic cloning. In that process, scientists create embryos that are identical to people, not to make babies but to obtain cells that can be used as exact tissue matches for scientists to work for cures to various cancers, hepatitis and other diseases. Unlike regular embryos, cloned embryos do not comprise sperm and an egg but rather a sample from one individual.

Montana man dies while water skippin

Associated Press

HELENA, Mont. — Gary Hoyt couldn't swim and was deathly afraid of water. Yet authorities say friends persuaded him to climb aboard a snowmobile, open the throttle and drive it across an open reservoir on a hot July evening.

The White Sulphur Springs man made it safely to the opposite shore, skipping the borrowed machine over the water's surface like a stone. He turned the sled around on the bank and gunned the engine to begin the 200-yard return trip.

Just 50 feet out, the snowmobile lost momentum and floundered. It plummeted to the bottom and Hoyt, 46, and wearing no life jacket, went down with it.

His death July 8 was the first in Montana connected to an increasingly popular pastime called water skipping, and it has prompted state fish and game officials to consider regulating the activity.

The Fish, Wildlife and Parks Commission will take up the question at its meeting here Thursday.

"I'd like to see some type of regulation because it's unsafe in my point of view," said Beate Galda, head of enforcement for the Fish, Wildlife and Parks Department. "I'm concerned for the safety of the rider and any other recreationist who might be using the same area."

Snowmobiles were never designed to be used on open water, so they are not covered by boating laws, Galda said. Snowmobile riders — unlike water skiers and personal watercraft pilots — are not required to wear life jackets, and laws prohibiting motor vehicles from being driven into most waterways also don't apply to snowsleds, she said.

"Our laws are just not set up for summer use by snowmobilers," Galda concluded.

The commission may consider emergency regulations to ban or restrict snowmobile use on public waters. Legislative action would be needed to extend boating laws to the machines, Galda said.

The Montana Snowmobile Association has urged the commission to study the issue more before it acts. Find out what other states do and gather public comment first, said Fay Lesmeister of Fort Shaw, association president.

"This activity, if handled appropriately, should have no more of a hazardous or dangerous element to it that riding a personalized watercraft or a high-performance race boat, providing the correct set of safety requirements are in place," he wrote in a letter to the department.

Game Warden Capt. Terry Hill of Great Falls has heard of water skipping throughout the state.

It involves running a snowmobile down a bank or boat ramp into the water at full speed and hydroplaning across the water's surface. The fast-moving track intended to push the machine through snow spins rapidly enough to keep the snowmobile on top of the water — usually.

But the 500-pound machines don't float. A snowmobile that runs out of gas, stalls or even slows down too much will sink immediately.

Hill said the activity creates other problems as well.

The machines cause wakes near shore where none are allowed, Hill said. Boaters, swimmers and water skiers can be at risk, and a sunken snowmobile can leak oil and gas into the water, he added.

Galda said she surveyed 11 other states and only Nebraska bans water skipping.

Tom Hafer, owner of Anaconda Motor Sports, said he h[illegible] water skipping three ti[illegible] doesn't believe regulatio[illegible] needed. While water skip[illegible] popular in the Midwest ar[illegible] where it has evolved int[illegible] tioned racing, few peop[illegible] will risk losing their [illegible] machines.

"It's never going to amou[illegible] big deal here because the[illegible] float," he said. "You'll hav[illegible] extremists who want to try [illegible] most won't want to tak[illegible] $7,000 to $8,000.machines[illegible] the water."

California awaits new temple

Newport Beach temple has the same design as the Red- Temple, pictured here. The church just recently announced ew temple and have plans to be completed by next year.

Newport Beach city officials are in the process of approving a new temple for The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

"We believe the city officials are going to approve it because it is a smaller size, and therefore won't be the traffic generator that a larger temple would be," said Bob Wynn, retired city manager of Newport Beach and current member of the temple committee.

The Newport temple is part of President Hinckley's vision to house the increasing worldwide population of the Church of Jesus Christ.

"We are very excited," said Joseph Bentley, church spokesman. "If all goes well, construction could start later this year. It may take as little as a year to build."

If the Newport Beach temple is approved, it will make travel more convenient for local church members that have had to travel to San Diego or Los Angeles to attend a temple.

"The members of the church in Orange County are very pleased," Wynn said.

Plans have been in progress continuously since the official announcement of building a temple in April.

"We will soon have an accessible site plan showing the temple location, landscaping and height of it, but for now it is unreleased because they are still modifying and fine tuning the plans," Wynn said.

> "We believe the city officials are going to approve it because it is a smaller size, and therefore won't be the traffic generator that a larger temple would be."
> — Bob Wynn, Retired Newport Beach city manager

At 17,500 square feet, it will be one of a new generation of small temples. Next to the future temple stands the 28,500 square-foot stake center.

The San Diego temple is 82,000 square feet and the Los Angeles temple is 190,614 square feet.

It will have two endowment rooms, three sealing rooms and be operated by appointment only. Attendees are required to bring their own temple clothing because there will not be a laundry facility.

Olympic posters honor Y alumni

By Randy Mah
randy@newsroom.byu.edu
NewsNet Staff Writer

A new showcase of Olympic posters is finally complete and on display in the Cougareat.

The posters honor twelve Olympic athletes who are BYU alumni.

The poster campaign was conceived last October when the Student Auxiliary Services Creative Marketing department was asked to design new posters for the Cougareat.

"The purpose of the posters are to provide recognition and motivation," said Marie Withers, a graphic designer for SASCM. There are 70 Olympians who are BYU alumni, Withers said.

"There is soul in this project," Withers said. "We wanted to show pride in our BYU Olympians and share in the Olympic spirit."

Fraser Buck, SASCM manager, said the posters would bring an appreciation for the quality of students that attend BYU.

"We want to show off and play up the history and heritage of BYU students," said Kelly Dyches, 24, a senior from Provo, majoring in graphic design.

Some universities publicize the history of their students to build an atmosphere of motivation, Dyches said.

The twelve athletes featured in the posters were chosen to represent a variety of sports, countries and gender, said Dyches.

Withers said it was difficult to choose between the athletes.

"It was hard to find pictures of women and athletes from different countries," Withers said.

"Over 160 hours of design work and research on the athletes has been done," Withers said.

Each poster contains a short biography on the athletes, Withers said.

"It is inspiring to learn and meet with athletes," he said.

Kimberley Bushman, 24, a senior from Gau-Bicklehiem, Germany, majoring in English, said she has gained an appreciation for what BYU students have done since the beginning of the university.

Bushman, who is responsible for research and writing for the posters, said writing the biographies for each athlete is a way of being involved in the Olympics.

Along with the collection of 16 posters, four additional posters will be designed. One or two posters will be connected with the Paralympics, Withers said.

The posters have replaced displays that are three years old, Withers said. The posters and biographical information will be displayed in the Cougareat until Spring 2002.

"I love the job and when it stops being fun I'm out of here," Bell said.

Bell said part of the job is dealing with noise and pranks.

"There are lots of fun stories, most of which I will never tell," she said. "I don't treasure people getting ideas."

Bell said the job is rewarding.

A few of years ago she received a call from a man who had been one of her worst pranksters. She used to punish students by having them clean bathrooms. This student was the fastest bathroom cleaner, Bell said.

"He said 'I just wanted to call and thank you because you never got angry with me. You never gave up on me. You always told me that God loves me and so did you,'" Bell said.

Bean Museum opens sheep exhibit

Wild sheep are the focus of a new exhibit at BYU's Monte L. Bean Life Science Museum.

The "Wild Sheep of the World" exhibit, featuring 20 fully mounted sheep, is the most extensive collection of wild sheep in the world, said Duane Smith, museum director.

The collection is the most extensive in terms of representation of the different varieties of sheep, Smith said.

"As we looked at our collections, we noticed that we had a very strong representation of all the species of sheep in the world," said Douglas Cox, assistant museum director.

"By exhibiting those, we could demonstrate some of the similarities and differences between the various groups of sheep," Cox said.

According to display information, the collection contains specimens representing each of the wild sheep groups.

The groups are divided by areas of geographic distribution including North America, Central and Eastern Asia, and the Middle East and Europe.

The exhibit features some familiar specimens such as Rocky Mountain and Desert Bighorns, and some lesser-known animals such as the Argali and Aoudad Sheep of Central Asia.

"They're kind of like priceless pieces of art," said Duke Rogers, curator of mammals.

Some of the sheep were collected in areas such as China and Russia where removal of animals is no longer allowed. That makes the specimens valuable and irreplaceable, he said.

Rogers said animal specimens are often shot and collected without any locality data, information about the animals' habitat and lifestyle.

BYU's collection is particularly valuable because it includes important locality data about the sheep, Rogers said.

The wild sheep exhibit is an example of the Bean Museum's work as a professional research museum, Cox said.

The Bean Museum's extensive animal collections also make it one of the largest museums in the Intermountain West, he said.

The sheep specimens were prepared by taxidermists throughout the world, and the exhibit was designed by museum staff, Smith said.

The exhibit is located in the center atrium of the museum and runs through November.

Summer suggestion

What was the last book you read —not the last book you had to read but the last book you wanted to read? When was the last time you spent some time at a bookstore looking through the novels or the new nonfiction section? If it has been a while, you're missing out.

Turn off the television, put homework aside for a few minutes, and pick a book that interests you. It could be a novel, a biography, or a history of the civil war. Specific content doesn't matter as much as whether it interests you. Then read it. Get caught up in the lives of the people you are reading about. Learn about a different lifestyle – discover similarities and understand differences.

At the risk of sounding cheesy, a book can change your life. No other media can help a participant understand another person or another culture or a different idea better than books can.

Think about it. Television at times can be a meaningful learning experience, but what can be taught in a half hour that is significant? Newspapers are a great source of information but they don't go into deep details or underlying concepts. Movies can share important messages but all too often they are glossed over.

A book, though, immerses the reader in a story. The author of a good book teaches their perspective of the world to the reader in real and significant way.

Take the classic "To Kill a Mockingbird." That novel says so much about life. High school students all over the west gained a much more accurate grasp of real racial tension from the book. City kids learned about small town life. Boys caught a glimpse of a girl's first steps into maturity. Everyone discovered they need to be a little more aware of racism. The movie doesn't teach all that.

One month from Saturday the summer will end and regular classes with begin again. Hopefully, your summer hasn't been all studying and no fun, summer should never be that way. When fall begins and five or six classes start for everyone, free time will become much harder to find. So this is the challenge for everyone who reads this piece: read a book before fall semester begins. Start today.

Don't know what to read? Pick your favorite movie – it could very well have started as a book, and you'll probably like the book even more than the movie. Pick your favorite celebrity – more than likely they have written a book or a book has been written about them.

For sports lovers, Ira Berkow wrote a very intelligent book about basketball called Court Vision: Unexpected Views on the Lure of Basketball. He talked with many famous lovers of basketball including Julia Child, Grover Washington Jr., a jazz musician and Woody Allen. Their thoughts are an insightful and interesting commentary on the sport.

If you're in the mood for a timeless classic, try Charles Dickens' "Tale of Two Cities." Dickens weaves an intricate plot around the meaningful themes of redemption and forgiveness.

Mystery lovers could try one of Sue Grafton's series. Grafton reportedly had a messy divorce and stayed up at nights pondering the perfect way to murder her ex. She knew she would never have the nerve so she wrote her plan into a book. Her sleuth, Kinsey Millhone, has now solved mysteries in 16 books. They're not incredibly insightful novels but they tell a good story.

A quick read is "Tuesday's With Morrie" by Mitch Albom. It details the conversations of a sports writer and his dying former professor.

There are a million books out there. Find one and read it. There's just something about learning for learning's sake.

THE WORLD ENDED TODAY .... BUT FIRST, THIS UPDATE ON THE CONDIT-LEVY AFFAIR!

VIEWPOINT

Middle ground

I've learned a few things in my 21 years on this planet. Wash stains in cold water, for example. Tsp. Means teaspoon, not tablespoon (that mac and cheese was vile). "Promulgated" isn't a word. There are people who don't know "promulgated" isn't a word. You know, stuff like that.

I've also learned there are two sides to every story.

Take water conservation for example. We've all heard a lot about conserving water the last few months. Mark Eubank on channel five and Dan Pope on channel four have little water conservation segments almost every night. (I think channel two has just taken to re-broadcasting episodes of Entertainment Tonight during their newscast).

It's a long-standing tradition in Utah to turn sprinklers on at about 9 a.m. and turn them off four or five months later.

So, trying to convince people to be more conscientious about their water use is about as effective as trying to convince a La Verkin City Council member that the United Nations will never have on its agenda: "steal and eat all babies in La Verkin, Utah."

Kristina Whitley

Associate Campus Editor

We all know we need to be better about conserving water.

But I'm one of those bleeding-heart liberals who jump headfirst into losing fights on a principle. (I voted for Bill Orton, for crying out loud.)

So when I heard "water conservation," I immediately thought, as have many well-intentioned but not quite as well-informed environmental activists, we should all rip out our beautiful, but water-greedy Kentucky bluegrass and plant yucca, sagebrush and buffalo grass.

These plants are drought-resistant, and native to Utah — environmental conscientiousness and state pride in one blow!

Let me just be honest with you: when I started writing this viewpoint, I was going to write an impassioned, high-idealed plea for Utahns to cast away the chains of a society which demands bluegrass and tulips — even in desert lawns.

I even had this big metaphor worked out with that Mormonad poster that says, "Be Your Own Kind of Beautiful." (My last line was gonna be, "who says the only way to make the desert bloom is with Kentucky Bluegrass?" Pretty good, huh?)

But, alas, as my 21 years have also taught me, I am, on rare occasion, wrong.

I had an interesting conversation with the Salt Lake City Water Conservation Coordinator, Stephanie Duer, yesterday.

I asked her a very leading question, hoping she'd confirm my belief in extreme grass measures.

But instead, she answered, "it's not about eliminating all grass; it's about being wiser with where you put grass."

Turns out, there aren't just two sides to this story. There are, like, six or seven!

Duer explained that certain soil types and certain lawns actually work really well with grass.

The biggest problems, according to Duer, are overwatering and putting grass in "stupid places."

Now that we're thirteen inches into an utterly self-deprecating article, get ready for my shining moment of glory.

I was right that it's stupid to have that strip of grass in the middle of University Parkway! Yes!

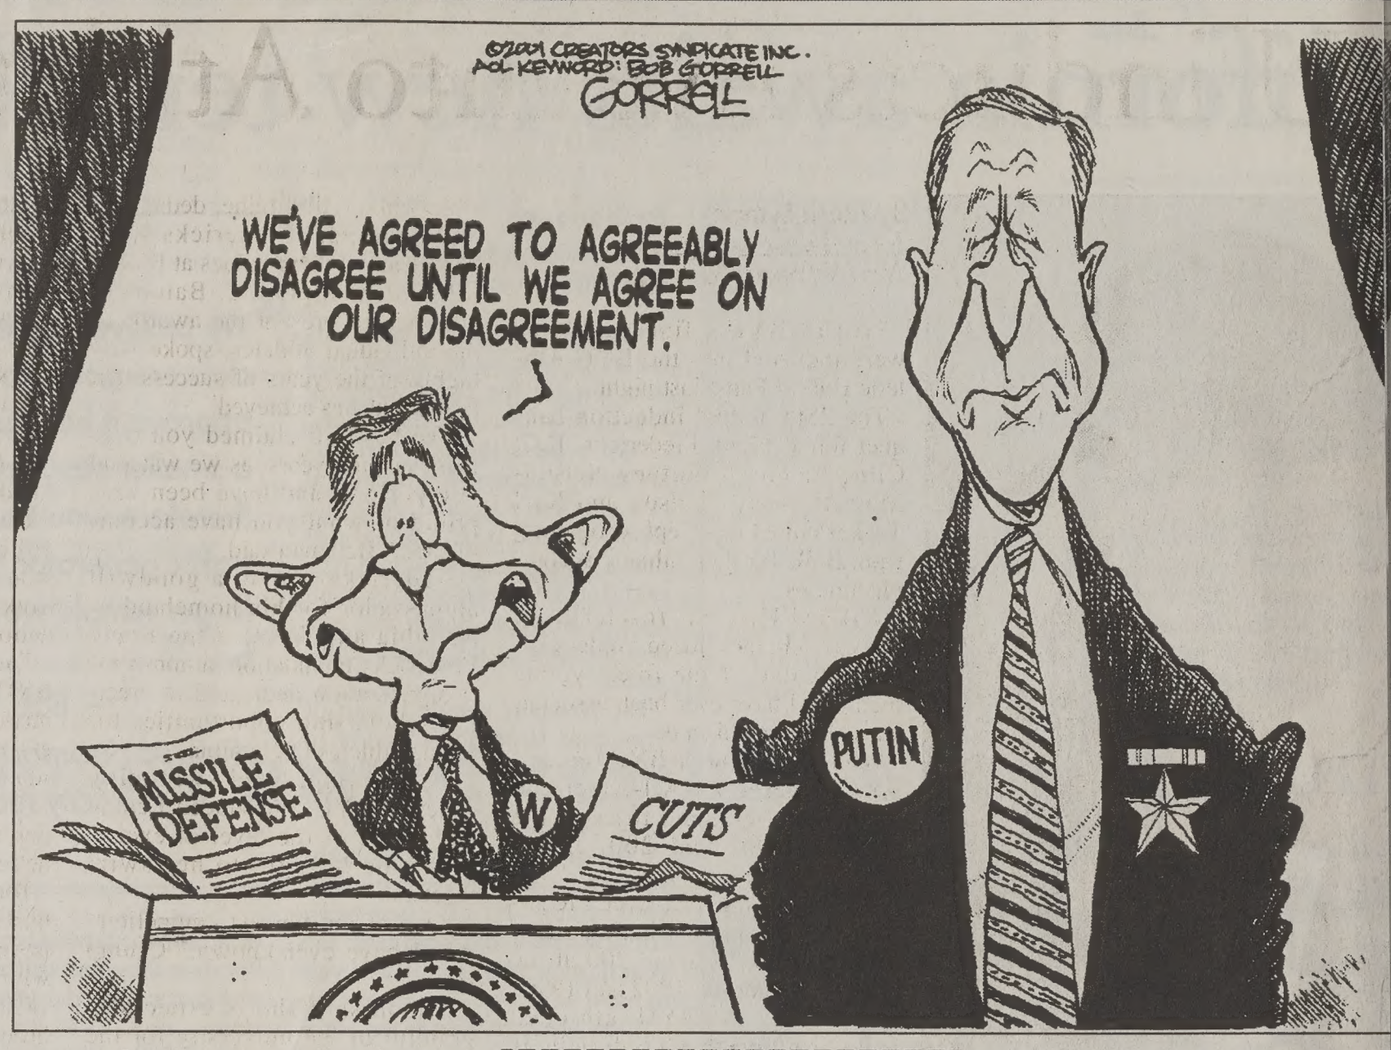
Duer said watering areas that small and that hot, wastes tons of water.

Plus, having the grass on University Parkway encourages overly creative freshmen to have picnics there.

I've been honest; I was wrong about the psycho-liberal yucca plan.

So maybe the members of the community who selfishly believe they can dump gallons and gallons of water on acres and acres of lawn because Provo city hasn't placed restrictions on watering yet could also re-evaluate their positions.

And somebody get that guy up by the temple to fix his gushing sprinkler head. He uses as much water as the entire city of La Verkin. That is, until the U.N. outlaws water in La Verkin. (Evil laugh.)



Relative goodness

Dear Editor,

Please accept a friendly difference of opinion from that expressed in a recent piece about "Simpsons and their moral authority." The shows that "we" watch as stated in this July 24 article could more accurately be identified as the shows "some Americans watch."

The content of television programming today, including some of the shows mentioned, contain material contrary and even toxic to a Christ-centered life.

The process described as the writer has "grown to love" the Simpsons might be articulated in the First Presidency's July message by President Monson:

Vice is a monster of so frightful mien
As to be hated needs but to be seen;
Yet seen too oft, familiar with her face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace.

Remember the gospel of Jesus Christ enlightens us with a knowledge of absolute truths. We accept truth on its own merit, not because it is better than anything else available. Likewise, we know to reject evil notwithstanding its relative goodness compared to even darker evils.

In his efforts to find redeeming merit for a popular culture that the author has accepted as his own, I offer a recommendation. Surround yourself with a culture of books, music, and film that is really wonderful but has been left behind by many. There is so much that is really good, though I admit it takes effort to find. Throughout the years there have been some truly inspired authors, statesmen, musicians, playwrights, and the like who may appeal to you. There is some real good literature currently produced that is of outstanding quality. Today we have access to quite a bit of "virtuous, lovely ... (and) praiseworthy" material.

China's Olympics

Dear Editor,

I must respond to the editorial about the 2008 Olympics in China and its possible influence on human rights. I am a human rights activist and have done research on human rights in China. The Chinese government has expressly stated that it considers international pressure for human rights to be contrary to international law, and that human rights are an internal issue. The 2008 Olympics hardly stand a chance to influence human rights in China.

Many believe that increased exposure and interaction between China and the west will pressure the Chinese government to change. However, recent increases in trade, cultural influence, and internet exposure between China and the west have only resulted in significant increases in human rights abuses by the Chinese government. This may be the Chinese government's attempt to prevent any liberating effects that the changes might have. I don't know; but my opinion is that the 2008 Olympics will have no effect, positive or negative, on the human rights practices of the Chinese Government. Olympics are only games.

South hill ambiance

Dear Editor,

As residents of south campus, we have the privilege of ascending the JSB hill on a daily basis. In the past, the walk assured not only physical invigoration, but also an ambiance of peace and tranquility. However, we are sorry to report that this once beautiful landscape has become the scene of a vast degradation.

No more do we hear the sound of birds humming in the trees, nor are we cognizant of the aforementioned beauty of the hill. Now our experience can be compared to wading through waters of filth. Traction is greatly limited due to the grotesque moss and algae that now plague the surface of the hill. No longer can we enjoy the serenity of nature, as we are preoccupied with simply surviving the trek up to campus.

Surely with the amount of resources we have here, and with the highly skilled landscape enhancement workers of this university, a remedy to this problem can and must be ascertained. Must we continue to forge through the heinous treachery that this hill exhibits? Will something be done? Or must we instead be subjected to finding an alternative route to campus—one that is safe, and more pleasing to the eye?

Tulane tickets

Dear Editor,

I am a BYU football fan and come to the student body with a plea. There is no greater excitement than a BYU football game. As you know, we have been rewarded an extra game that will be played August 25th against Tulane. Usually Edwards Stadium is at full capacity of 65,000 screaming fans, but due to the game taking place before school begins, there have only been 20,000 tickets sold. It will be a shame if we can't fill the stadium for the opening game. My plea to all of the students is: If you are here during that time, please buy a ticket and show your support. The tickets are cheap and you don't want to miss it … the Cougars will win!

Stem cell research

Dear Editor,

The article about a Utah family's fight for stem-cell research left out one small detail – their personal stance on the source of those much-needed stem cells.

The national controversy over whether federal funds should go toward stem cell research is centered on the moral question about whether the medical community should use and, as a result, destroy, human embryos which had the potential to become live human beings. Many say that the embryos were "surplus" and destined to be destroyed.

The main issue is whether the fertility clinics that create and store these embryos should destroy them as well. If we support federal funds going toward research using these embryos, we support fertility clinics' procedures that destroy these "surplus" embryos. Many would say that embryos aren't alive yet so it isn't immoral to destroy them. Sounds a lot like an abortion debate to me.

There are many ways of obtaining stem cells, such as umbilical cord blood and placenta from newborn babies, the above mentioned embryos, and from aborted fetuses.

I realize the amazing benefits of [illegible] cell research. I would just like to re[illegible] to know and consider where they [illegible] like to have these stem cells come [illegible] as the article did not address it at all [illegible]

Not all cells are alik[illegible]

Dear Editor,

Balance. All I request in future arti[illegible] on the subject of stem cell research is [illegible] ance.

What I mean is this – all stem [illegible] research is not created equal.

There are essentially four kinds:

1) opening up five to seven days [illegible] human embryos and collecting [illegible] "inner cell mass" cells (embryonic st[illegible] cells);

2) dissecting the bodies of aborted [illegible] miscarried fetuses of five to nine we[illegible] of age and collecting the "germi[illegible] ridge"
cells (fetal stem cells);

3) collecting blood from the place[illegible] and umbilical cord after birth (umbil[illegible] cord stem cells); and

4) collecting blood or bone marr[illegible] cells, or taking biopsies from various [illegible] sues and organs of children and adu[illegible] (adult stem cells).

Many people, like myself, believe t[illegible] "life begins at conception" is a scient[illegible] fact. For us, any type of stem c[illegible] research that requires the death of [illegible] human embryo or fetus is much m[illegible] than "controversial" – it is very, very se[illegible] ous. From our vantage point, us[illegible] embryonic stem cells for experiments [illegible] exactly the same as sacrificing a [illegible] grown adult so that his/her organs co[illegible] be transplanted into someone else w[illegible] would die without that transplant. T[illegible] only difference is the age of the hum[illegible] life being sacrificed in the name of m[illegible] ical science.

I would ask that in the future any a[illegible] cles on stem cell research fully take in[illegible] account the opposing point of view a[illegible] not just mention it in passing as, "oh, [illegible] the way, this is controversial". It is v[illegible] controversial for very significant, life [illegible] death reasons.

YU inducts five into Athletic Hall of Fame redericks dressed up for his acceptance Athletic Hall of Fame. Fredericks is one s most decorated track athletes.

By Mark Lyman
lyman@newsroom.byu.edu
NewsNet Sports Writer

Five of BYU's finest athletes were inducted into the BYU Athletic Hall of Fame last night.

The 25th annual induction banquet found Frank Fredericks, K.C. Cline Lemon, Courtney Nelson-Murrell, Andy Toolson and Karl Tucker united to accept recognition from BYU for their athletic accomplishments.

Willard Hirschi, former head track coach, introduced Fredericks.

"He is one of the finest young men that I have ever been associated with," Hirschi said.

While a student at BYU, Fredericks garnered 11 All-American awards and claimed titles in the outdoor 100- and 200- meter events and the indoor 200.

On the international level, Fredericks is no slacker, winning silver medals in the 100 and 200 at the Olympic Games in 1992 and 1996.

Speaking of BYU athletes, Hirschi noted that Fredericks is probably the most widely known on the international scene.

Fredericks mentioned how important Hirschi has been as a coach during his years at BYU.

"My achievements in international competitions are, thus, in no small way as a result of the firm hand and guidance of this great coach," Fredericks said.

Fredericks holds world records for the indoor 100 and 200.

"Despite the fame and recognition that comes with achievements in the arena of international athletics it is important to state that such achievements would never be possible without discipline, dedication and courage," Fredericks said. "I've learned these values at BYU."

President Merrill J. Bateman, who helped present the awards to the individual athletes, spoke very highly of the years of success that Fredericks has achieved.

"We have all claimed you over these last ten years, as we watched you perform and have been very proud of what you have accomplished," Bateman said.

Fredericks is also a goodwill ambassador for his homeland of Namibia and founded the Frank Fredericks Foundation, a non-profit organization dedicated to creating scholarship opportunities for young athletes of Namibia.

Stan Crump, head swimming coach at BYU, introduced Lemon and spoke of the level of excitement she brought to her swim meets.

"One of the fiercest competitors that I have ever known," Crump said.

Lemon said she is especially grateful to the university for the direction that was given her.

Lemon broke 22 school records during her stay here at BYU and finished in the top ten at the NCAA Championships four times. She earned five All-American citations as an outstanding swimmer.

Among other awards, Lemon was Pacific Northwest Swimmer of the year in 1990, Western Athletic Conference Swimmer of the Year in 1991 and received the Leona Holbrook Spirit of Sport Award in 1991 for personifying the true spirit of sport in competition and life.

In a day when BYU had no platform for diving, Nelson-Murrell led the nation twice in the event.

Nelson-Murrell would travel once a month to Stanford University to train with her club coach.

Nelson-Murrell won the NCAA's first platform diving title in 1990 and successfully defended her title the following year. Having won seven All-American awards, Nelson-Murrell is BYU's most decorated diver.

Toolson was a key part of the 1988 BYU basketball team that won 17 consecutive games and was ranked as high as second in the nation.

Toolson still holds records at BYU for most career three-pointers made (141) and most three-pointers made in a season (74). As a senior at BYU, Toolson lead BYU to a 1990 WAC title, averaged 18.3 points and was named a GTE Academic All-American.

Toolson has played professional basketball in Europe, in the Continental Basketball Association and with the Utah Jazz.

Currently, Toolson has been brought on to the men's basketball coaching staff as an assistant coach.

Karl Tucker led the BYU golf team to the first NCAA team championship at BYU in 1981.

Under Tucker's direction, the team amassed 19 WAC titles, 170 team championships and 69 of Tucker's players were named All-Americans.

Tucker received national recognition as well for his coaching. Tucker was WAC Coach of the Year 13 times, and was voted 1981 NCAA National Coach of the Year by the Golf Coaches Association of America.

Angels' top prospect signs deal; club assigns him to Mesa team

By Rich Devine
rich@newsroom.byu.edu
NewsNet Sports Writer

The Anaheim Angels have agreed to terms with first-round draft selection Casey Kotchman. Kotchman is the son of Provo Angels' manager Tom Kotchman.

Casey Kotchman played first base for Seminole High School in Florida. The Angels drafted him as the 13th overall pick in the Major League Baseball amateur draft, conducted June 5.

The 18-year-old draftee was named the 2001 Gatorade National High School Player of the Year. Baseball America ranked Casey Kotchman as the best pure hitter and power hitter among all high school players in the nation, and listed him as the eighth best prospect in the entire 2001 draft. He was also considered the prep player closest to reaching the major leagues.

Donny Rowlad, Anaheim director of scouting, said the Angels were very comfortable with drafting the younger Kotchman since many in the organization have seen him play since he was very young.

"In my 12 years of scouting, I've never been involved in drafting a player with whom the organization has as much history as the Angels do with Casey," Rowland said.

Casey Kotchman hit .456 with 44 runs scored, 14 doubles, one triple, five home runs and 32 RBIs in 31 games for Seminole High School this past season. He walked 32 times and struck out just twice. His high school team won the 2001 Florida 5A State Championship with a 31-0 record.

"Casey is a very talented, mature player who carries himself as a professional already," Rowland said. "He's an advanced hitter who can hit for average and hit with power. Defensively, he's as good as it gets for an 18-year-old player."

Casey Kotchman is no stranger to the minor leagues, having spent summers with his father's minor league teams, traveling with the team to road games.

After more than a month of negotiations, Tom Kotchman left the Angels last week to go to Florida and help finalize the signing. The Provo manager said he is relieved that his son is signed.

"He has a lot of work to do in order to get caught up with the other players," Tom Kotchman said. "It will take some time for him to get back into game shape. Even though he has continued working out, there is no substitute for taking live pitching in a game situation."

Casey Kotchman has been assigned to Anaheim's rookie league affiliate in Mesa, Ariz. Tom Kotchman said his son will not be called up to Provo unless he shows he can play like any other player, but added that such a call up is certainly possible.

Teams had until 4 p.m. EDT to complete trades.

"I was kind of prepared not to make any moves. At 3:50, I thought it was over. The deal went down at 3:59:25," Baltimore vice president of baseball operations Syd Thrift said.

From now until the rest of the season, teams can make trades only if they pass players through waivers. That happened several times last year — the New York Yankees got Luis Sojo in early August, and he wound getting the hit that won the World Series.

Several teams took care of business in the week leading up to deadline day.

The Chicago Cubs acquired slugger Fred McGriff, the Yankees got starter Sterling Hitchcock, Oakland obtained Jermaine Dye, Minnesota traded for Rick Reed, Philadelphia got Turk Wendell and Dennis Cook, and San Francisco dealt for Jason Schmidt and Andres Galarraga.

A couple of teams that were expected to make trades instead stood pat.

Toronto talked about trading Jose Cruz Jr., Shannon Stewart and pitcher Kelvim Escobar, Cincinnati discussed deals for Pokey Reese and Dmitri Young and the New York Mets considered a move with Glendon Rusch.

"We were close on a couple of deals," Blue Jays general manager Gord Ash said. "In the last hour there was a flurry of phone calls but for whatever reason nothing materialized.

"It's disappointing not to get something done," he said.

The NL East-leading Braves got Sanchez from Kansas City for a pair of minor leaguers, pitcher Brad Voyles and second baseman Alejandro Machado.

Atlanta is aiming at its 10th straight postseason appearance and wanted to make a move after losing 2000 NL Rookie of the Year Rafael Furcal to a season-ending shoulder injury.

Sanchez, who was hitting .303, is more known for his outstanding glove.

"It's hard to turn your back on a guy who can add that kind of defense to your club," Braves general manager John Schuerholz said. "You want to have the strongest defense possible up the middle. We've won a lot of games with pitching and defense."

Astacio was 6-13 with a 5.49 ERA and had won just once in his last 10 starts. Elarton also struggled, going 4-8 with a 7.14 ERA.

"Unfortunately, this year has not been good at all," Elarton said. "I wouldn't be standing here right now if I'd had a good season. It's a business, and you've got to treat it that way."

Williams had 22 saves for Pittsburgh, and joins a bullpen that includes closer Billy Wagner, Octavio Dotel and Mike Jackson.

Urbina, nearly traded to the New York Yankees in June, instead was sent to the rival Red Sox for minor league pitchers Tomo Ohka and Rich Rundles.

The Red Sox needed bullpen help, with closer Derek Lowe struggling all season, and found it with Urbina.

"He's death to right-handed hitters," Red Sox general manager Dan Duquette said. "If you need a strikeout in a key situation, he can provide that."

In other trades, St. Louis sent reliever Jason Christiansen to the San Francisco Giants for a minor leaguer and a player to be named or cash and Montreal traded outfielder Milton Bradley to Cleveland for minor league pitcher Zach Day.

HAVE YOU SEEN PLANET OF THE APES? WASN'T THAT THE BIGGEST WASTE OF MONEY YOU'VE EVER SEEN? (WELL, SINCE PEARL HARBOR, ANYWAY.) I MEAN, TALK ABOUT A LEGION OF PLOT HOLES AND LOOSE ENDS. IT FELT LIKE THEY HAD A MONKEY ACTUALLY WRITING PORTIONS OF THE SCRIPT. AND DON'T EVEN GET ME STARTED ON THAT INANE, CONTRIVED ENDING! OH- AND BY THE WAY, IF YOU'RE WONDERING WHAT HAPPENED TO THE "BOY BAND" STORY- I'M SORRY TO SAY THAT I'M SICK OF WRITING/DRAWING IT. SO LET'S JUST ALL PRETEND THAT I WRAPPED IT UP NICELY IN YESTERDAY'S STRIP AND THAT IT WAS REALLY FUNNY AND SATISFYING.

House debates Social Security

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The architect of new Social Security legislation to create personal investment accounts that President Bush favors while cutting benefits and taxing more income said Tuesday the plan should be a model for the tough choices facing the system.

"No one said the choices we face are easy, but anyone who says you that there is a painless way to fix Social Security isn't telling the whole truth," said Rep. John Kolbe, R-Ariz.

"You can cover up and shift the blame of reform, but you cannot eliminate the cost of reform," he said. The House Ways and Means Social Security subcommittee.

Kolbe and Rep. Charles Stenholm, D-Texas, were responding to critics of their plan, including the White House and House leadership in both parties. President Bush favors personal investment accounts but not the proposal's tax increases.

"A tax hike is a tax hike is a tax hike, and the president opposes tax hikes," White House spokesman Ari Fleischer said Monday. "The president does not think that's an effective way to save Social Security."

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., and Minority Leader Dick Gephardt, D-Mo., also said they would not support the bill.

"The bill's authors urged critics to look at the entire plan instead of the politically unpopular provisions of cutting benefits and increasing taxation.

"When critics on both sides of the aisle aim their artillery at isolated elements of our plan without outlining a complete, sustainable strategy of their own, we find it difficult to read the criticisms as more than political gamesmanship at its ugliest," Stenholm said.

To pay for the private accounts, benefits would be cut, especially for middle- and upper-income workers. The bill also would raise the level of earnings that could be taxed, reduce cost-of-living adjustments and speed up the current schedule raising the retirement age from 65 to 67.

Bush supports the idea of private accounts, but favors a voluntary approach for younger workers. He has not said how such a plan would be funded, and he convened a White House commission to work out details. Among his requirements: Benefits to retirees or people nearing retirement could not be reduced and payroll taxes could not be increased.

"The problem with tax hikes with Social Security is that's what's always been done, and it hasn't gotten the job done," Fleischer said. "Social Security is still going bankrupt, despite the fact that previous administrations and previous congresses relied on tax hikes as a way to boost revenue coming into the system."

The Kolbe-Stenholm proposal also would:

—Let workers invest 3 percent of their first $10,000 of earnings and 2 percent of remaining taxable earnings into a personal account.

—Supplement accounts for low-income workers. The government would match 50 percent of any voluntary contributions those workers make.

—Let workers choose a private investment company once an account balance reached $7,500.

—Cut guaranteed benefits for an average wage earner in 2020 by 19 percent and a maximum wage earner by 25 percent, but increase a low-wage worker's guaranteed benefits by 4 percent. Balances in private accounts are assumed to make up for any cuts.

—Raise the taxable wage base to 86 percent of earnings from the current 83.1 percent. It would affect workers with income over $90,800.

Social Security faces future funding problems when the large baby boom generation starts retiring. Bush's commission approved an interim report last week that said in 2016 Social Security would pay out more in benefits than it received in payroll taxes and would have to start spending the trust fund.

Opponents have said the report intended to create a crisis, when the real worry date is 2038. That is when the trust fund is projected to be depleted.

Murray murder suspect commits suicide Monday

By Marc Stevens
marc@newsroom.byu.edu
NewsNet Staff Writer

The man who Murray police say shot a Murray resident after driving over him in the Gart Sports parking lot at 5600 S. 900 East early Monday, killed himself late Monday night.

The suicide came after a brief chase and a four-hour standoff with police near the Helper port-of-entry in Carbon County.

After a four-hour standoff with police, which included intense negotiations with Price police negotiator, David Cartwright, Kent D. Kettle shot himself in the head, said Price police spokeswoman Shauna Fassett.

"The suspect's semi-automatic handgun was stolen from a car in Provo," Murray police detective Rob Hall said.

According to Murray Police, Monday at 6 a.m. Kettle, 36, shot Ike T. Johnson, 45, in the shoulder as Johnson was driving away from Kettle's ex-wife's apartment at 5600 S. Vine Street.

Johnson sped away in a maroon car and crashed into the Gart Sports sign on 900 East. Johnson exited his car and ran through the parking lot approximately 200 feet until he was run over by Kettle's car.

Kettle exited his vehicle, fired several more shots at Johnson and fled the scene in a stolen, white Honda Accord, according to the police.

"The victim died at the scene," Hall said.

According to Hall, Kettle drove the white Honda Accord to Payson where he left the Honda for a white Pontiac.

"At approximately 7 p.m., Price police officer Chad Feichko, spotted the suspect's Pontiac traveling west on SR 6," Fassett said.

According to Utah Highway Patrol spokesman, Doug McCleve, Kettle tried to evade pursuing officers until Helper police spike strips punctured his tires.

Kettle lost control of his car and stopped on a bridge overpass where a four-hour standoff commenced with law enforcement officers.

"By having his car stop on an overpass, it was good for the police, but bad for the suspect," Fassett said. "He had nowhere to go."

Kettle was flown by helicopter to the University of Utah Medical center where he was pronounced dead at approximately 2 a.m., Hall said.

Kettle had no previous convictions for violent offenses, but he had previously been charged with violating a protective order filed by his ex-wife, Hall said.

Research for missile defense approved

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A House Armed Services subcommittee on Tuesday approved billions for research and development of a missile defense system in a way that would give the general running the program great leeway in how to spend the funds.

"What we did today was the first step, the first passage of the president's missile defense program," said Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., chairman of the research and development subcommittee. "We embarked on a new era of rigorous testing, and I think took a giant step forward in advancing the security interests of this country."

Missile defense spending in fiscal 2002, which begins Oct. 1, would total $8.16 billion, about $135 million less than President Bush had requested, by squeezing a dozen programs for savings, Hunter said. One area the committee trimmed was a $28 million increase Bush had sought for space-based laser development, the truly "Star Wars" part of the program.

Overall, the subcommittee unanimously approved $37.7 billion for defense research and development, which was an increase of $100 million over the president's request, said Hunter. The measure includes new programs that would enable innovative small companies to challenge existing contractors for parts of defense contracts and one that would enhance the Defense Department's ability to field new technology quickly.

Under the measure, Lt. Gen. Ronald Kadish, director of the Ballistic Missile Defense Organization, would be given essentially six big blocks of funds, falling into such categories as "Terminal Defense Segment" and "Mid-course Defense Segment," that he could spend as he saw fit.

"I think we must give him the leadership tools if he is to get the job done," Hunter said.

Rep. John Spratt, D-S.C., a panel member and the Budget Committee's top Democrat, offered an amendment that would replace that with 13 categories to enable Congress to keep closer tabs on the money, but that was rejected on a party-line 14-12 vote.

White House threatens to veto farm aid

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The White House is threatening to veto a $7.5 billion farm aid package under consideration in the Senate because it would spend $2 billion more than the administration says is necessary.

The White House issued a statement of administration policy Monday that said $5.5 billion, the amount approved by the House, is more than adequate.

Over Republican objections, the Agriculture Committee approved the $7.5 billion bill last week, and on Monday the Democratic-controlled Senate decided to bring it to the floor Tuesday.

Republicans argued Tuesday that a confrontation with the White House could keep any of the money from getting to farmers.

"The president has left no doubt what he would do if this bill comes to him with a price tag of more than $5.5 billion," said Sen. Richard Lugar, R-Ind.

Lugar offered that figure as an alternative, but the Senate was expected to vote it down.

Democrats said the $7.5 billion measure was a fair response to problems on the farm.

"Without the assistance that's in this bill, tens of thousands are in danger or going out of business," said the Agriculture Committee chairman, Sen. Tom Harkin, D-Iowa.

The Agriculture Department estimates net farm income this year at $42.4 billion, $2.8 billion below last year. The 2001 estimate does not include the supplemental assistance the Senate is considering.

In its statement, the White House said "improvements in agricultural markets and stronger livestock and crop prices mean that the need for additional federal assistance continues to diminish."

Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle, D-S.D., has said he is determined to send President Bush a final version of the bill by the end of this week, when Congress is scheduled to begin its month long August recess. Unless the $5.5 billion in the bill is spent by the time fiscal year 2001 ends Sept. 30, Congress will be unable to provide the money.

The extra $2 billion in the Senate bill would come from the fiscal 2002 budget. Even so, spending it will make it that much harder for Bush and Congress to live within next year's budget without eating into Medicare surpluses, which Democrats and many Republicans in Congress consider politically risky.

General Dylewski, who is the new commander for Joint-Operations Southwest.

Aden said the Saudis do not have a problem with the women wearing conservative dress, instead of the abaya.

"It's common to walk down the street (in Saudi Arabia) and see women from India in their native dress, women from different African countries, or Asian countries in their native dress, as well as Americans and Europeans dressed in their normal attire," said Tarik Allagany, information supervisor for the Royal Embassy of Saudi Arabia in Washington D.C.

In a letter sent to President Bush and other high-ranking officials in the U.S. military, Rutherford Institute President John W. Whitehead said Saudis do not require non-Muslim women to wear traditional local attire for any reason, although foreigners are expected to dress conservatively.

Male service persons in Saudi Arabia are not required to wear traditional dress, according to the letter.

Part of the military policy is aimed toward protecting the female officers from a "possible terrorist attack," Aden said.

Yet, in Saudi Arabia it is against the law for local women to associate themselves with an American service male, so if Saudis see a woman with American service males they know she is an American, he said.

Aden said the military's claim that the abaya is "forced protection" against a terrorist attack is absurd and ridiculous.

The Rutherford Institute considers this policy to be unfair, and unequal treatment for female officers.

In some cases, having to wear religious clothing that is subordinate to men forces the female officers to be subjected to a lower profile, even in the presence of male officers of equal or lesser rank, according to the letter.

The letter also said that while the military may feel some deference toward wanting to respect local customs, this does not apply to the culture in Saudi Arabia; furthermore, is not necessary to the military's strategic mission that female officers wear the abaya.

"It should not come at the price of reinforcing gender stereotypes that American law and culture long ago rejected," said Whitehead in the letter.

"By putting them in a Muslim outfit and requiring them to sit in the back of the jeep, as they do, they are signaling, to not only the Saudi hosts, but more importantly to American male service members, that this kind of second-class treatment is okay," Aden said.

Lapan said there is no requirements for female officers sit in the back seat.

He also said it is a local custom and the servicewomen voluntarily follow it to adhere to local customs and avoid unnecessary confrontation.

The Muslims, because of their Semitic heritage, believe that women should not have their heads unadorned, and that they should wear their heads covered as a sign of submission to God and to males, Aden said.

"To put that outfit on an American servicewoman who may be of another faith, such as Christian, as some of them are, is a little like putting a yarmulke on a service person because they happen to be stationed in Jerusalem," Aden said.

Lawyers from the Rutherford Institute have been in contact with servicewomen, and the organization is contemplating suit if the policy, which is under review by the Joint-Chiefs-of-Staff and the Secretary of Defense, is not rescinded, Aden said.

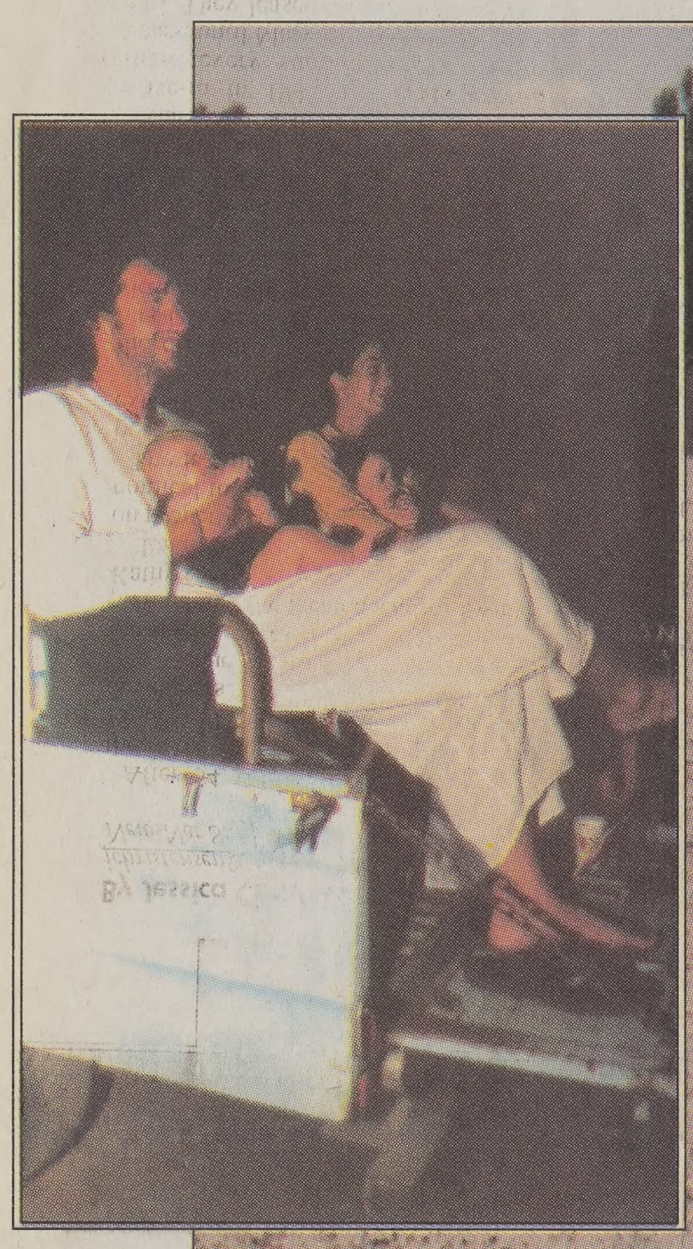
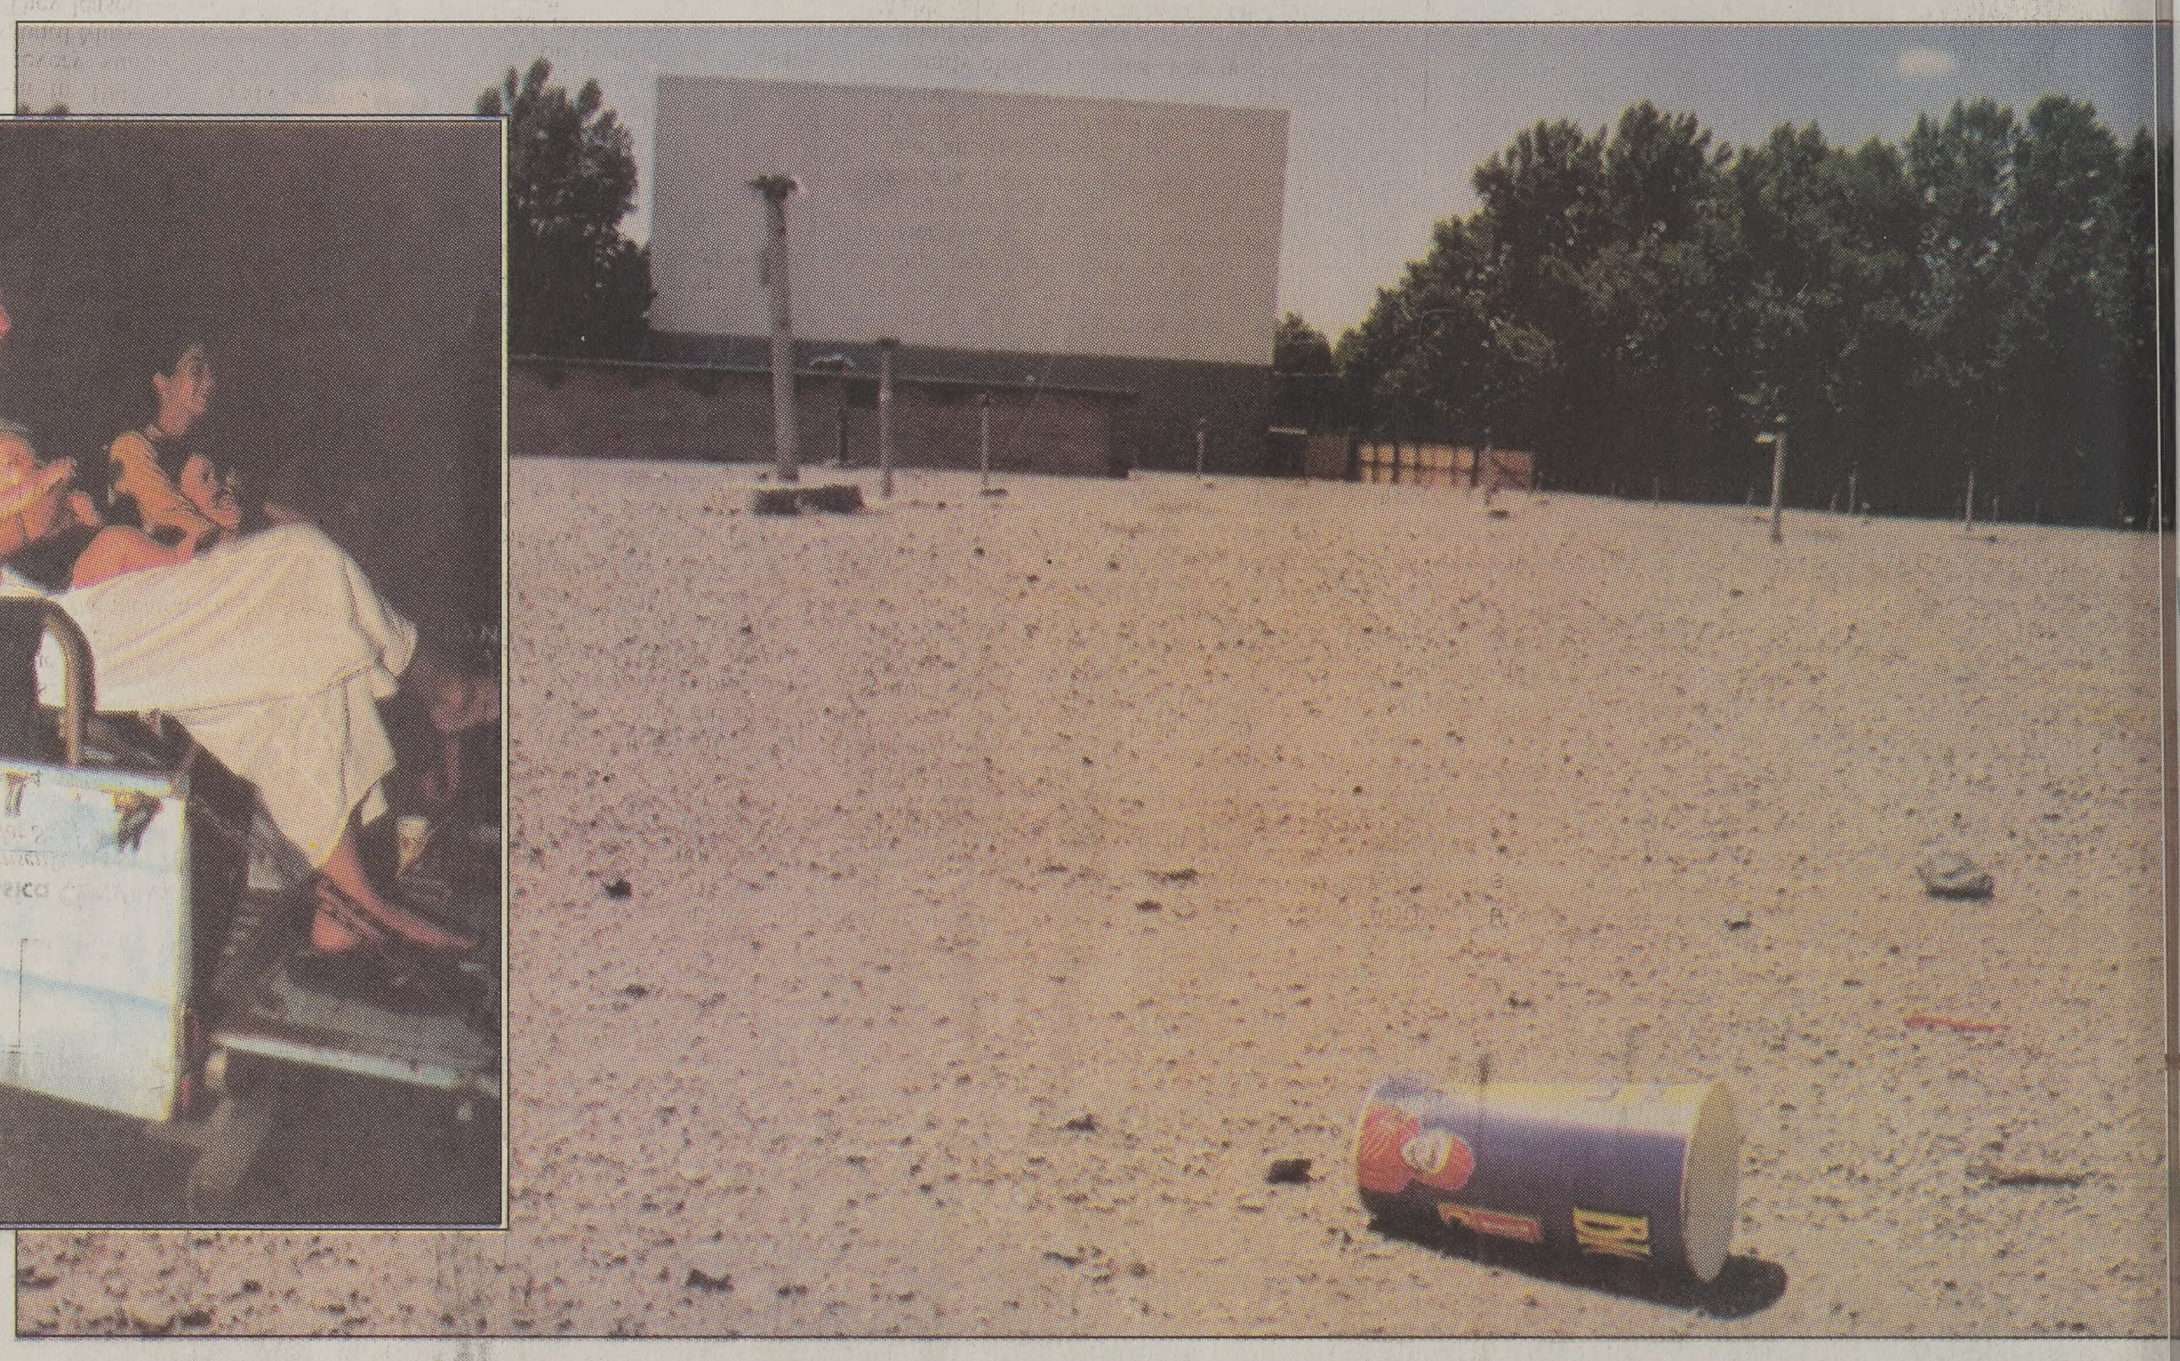
Pioneer Drive-In drivin' out





By Jessica Christensen
jchristensen@newsroom.byu.edu
NewsNet Staff Writer

After 54 years of double features, the Cox family is selling Provo's Pioneer Twin Drive-In Theatre to developers.

The value of the land increased such that selling it is more lucrative than maintaining the theater, said co-owner Kathy Cox.

"Land values and taxes are so high on property now that it's not even economical to run a drive-in," Cox said.

The last night of business was supposed to be June 14, which was then extended to July 19.

However, three of the four movies at the drive-in were top ten box office hits last week. So, the actual date of closure is still in question.

"We anticipate that it will be fairly soon but we're not certain of an exact date right now," said purchaser Don Mullen of Orem. "The time it takes is just a normal part of development."

Marv and Jeanine Cox opened the drive-in in 1947 and have worked there every summer night for 46 years, until Marv's illness seven years ago. They leased the drive in to Wes Webb of Salt Lake City.

After her husband's death a year ago, Jeanine Cox felt that it was time to sell the theater.

"Now that my husband is gone and I'm older, I think it's time that we had a break," she said.

Mullen plans to make good use of the land.

"Part of the project is going to be residential — there will be town homes and single-family homes and the front part is commercial," Mullen said. "What we'd like to see in there is a grocer and a strip mall."

He said he thinks there will be an increased need for retail in the area.

"As the area gets cleaned up, and as we get more residents in there, then it should increase the likelihood for success of a grocer or other tenets in a strip mall," Mullen said.

Webb considered the lease a good investment.

"I owned the drive-in in Springville so when (the Cox's) decided not to operate it anymore, it seemed natural for me to have both drive-ins rather than have a competitive situation," Webb said.

He closed the Art City Drive-In because he felt that devoting time to the Pioneer theater was a better use of his time.

Jeanine Cox recalled her earliest memories of the drive-in.

"My husband built that theater and it was the first in Utah County," she said. "When we first opened, it was a dollar a car on Monday and Tuesday. We washed all the car windows as they went in."

Like in the movies, the employees took orders and delivered the food to the cars.

"When I first started working out there, I was a carhop and had to go around to every single car, knock on the window, get their order, and take back their hamburgers and stuff before intermission," Jeanine Cox said.

Many local residents are disappointed to see the last drive-in in Utah County close.

"I feel bad for the high school students that won't get to go on dates to the drive-in," said Brooke Perkins, 20, a senior from Orem, majoring in biology teaching.

Not only was the drive-in a place for dates but it was also a good environment for families.

"I remember all of us packing up the minivan with candy, popcorn, lawn chairs and blankets when I was young," said Terra Reary of Springville.

The Coxs would not play R-rated movies because they insisted that the drive-in was for families.

"We had so many articles done on our theater because so many were closing and they wondered why the Pioneer was filling up all the time," said Jeanine Cox. "It's mainly because we wouldn't play R's in this kind of an environment."

"I think it's a real sad thing," she said. "We raised our kids here. It kept our family close and it was a wonderful thing for us."

Webb said drive-ins in Utah Valley are a thing of the past.

"I doubt very much if you'll see any drive-ins built from scratch, especially in Utah County with the price of land and the cost of developing one and operating it on a seasonal basis," Webb said.

Above: Cups and other skeletal remnants from the night before litter the ground at the Pioneer Drive-In during the day, leaving only the remembrance of the crowds. At night, trucks are the perfect platform for viewing a double feature. (Inset.)

Below left: The Pioneer Drive-In prided itself in having a family environment where children can become entranced in the magic of the big screen.

Below right: Once, speakers connected to posts at each parking space brought sound to viewers. Today, visitors listen to the movies sound over their car radios.
